Excerpt: . . . Who is that behind the big chair asked Janet. Kleins sister, Mog, said the great-aunt, gently. Come here, Mog! Mog came slowly forth, and stared at the Kanter girls from under her heavy eyebrows. Who is in that earthen crock behind you demanded Janet assuming a stern tone. Prue felt distressed at Janets persistence, but the greataunt answered very softly, It is little Guld! And bending over the crock, she lifted him out. He was smaller than any of the others, with shrewd eyes and warlike fists, but when Janet laughed, little Guld looked up at her and laughed back again. Janet was no longer in doubt. I am so glad we have found you, she said, cordially. You are kobolds, I am sure, and I suppose there are dozens more of you in those dark corners. We didnt know you were in the neighborhood. You wont mention it, I hope, said the brisk woman, uneasily. The great-aunt laid down her knitting and asked in a trembling voice if Janet would not kindly give her her needle. Not yet, said Janet; and Prue, who had felt a slight alarm relieved only by the thought of the invisible ring in her pocket, now remembered what she and Janet had read about odd little people who live in strange corners of the earth, and who will do all in their power to oblige a person who has anything of theirs in his possession. We want to...
